KOSHER FOOD

The term "kashrut" refers to the set of rules determining the types of permissible and prohibited food. Jewish law forbids eating several types of food derived from animals (such as pork, seafood or insects), or fruits (from a young tree). In addition, there are a number of rules for the treatment and processing of food, in order for it to be permissible for eating. Food subject to these rules is considered "kosher".

There are several levels of adherence to kashrut laws amongst Jews in Israel:

- Basic observance (do not eat pork or seafood): 70% (additional 30% do not observe Kashrut laws at all)
- Of the above 70%, 30% adhere to at least "regular" kashrut supervision. The rest of the 70% simply don't eat seafood and pork.
- Of the above 30%, 15% observe "extra" kashrut supervision (Super kosher). The rest of the 30% adhere to "regular" kashrut.

There are a number of bodies in Israel which provide kashrut supervision for companies and products:

The Israeli Chief Rabbinate ("regular" kashrut): A government body which has the regulatory authority to approve kashrut in Israel. This organization gives "basic" kashrut supervision to food products in all categories, and is accepted by those who will eat "regular" kosher foods.

Badatz HaEda Haredit (Ultra Orthodox Community / "Super kosher"): The oldest and largest body among private entities that provides kashrut supervision in Israel and abroad. This kashrut is considered the most rigorous in quality and in maintaining all terms and conditions of kashrut. People who eat only "extra" kosher foods are careful to consume only products supervised by Badatz.

There are numerous other private kashrut entities, which differ in quality and acceptance level amongst the consumers of "extra" kosher products:

One of the characteristics of Passover, celebrated for 7 days, is the prohibition against eating "chametz" - foods containing wheat and grains (like gluten). During this holiday, it is prohibited to keep chametz in the house.
